I need to develop a small hardware device that has a built in web-cam. The device itself is very small and needs to have a very good quality webcam. I know there is cheap webcams available but the problem is that they are very thick. The device will be mostly embedded in a circuit board, so the weight is important. I am not sure if the problem can be solved by using a lens since I don't know how much I can achieve. I have searched in the web and I found that I could get a webcam that has a very thin lens that can be made from plastic. So my question is how can I convert this image into something that could give me the same guality as I would get if I was looking from a normal webcam in a room with no light? Is this possible at all with a homemade lens? A: A dome or a ball lens. Put a penny on the side of the dome. If the penny is in the right spot, the light will converge a little to the side and the center of the dome will be dark. For the ball lens, place the penny near the bottom of the ball and look at what happens. This is a pretty good basic lens. Mount a web cam on a circuit board with a 1/2" square socket and you'll have a camera with no glass plate and inexpensive. The efficiency of a chemical reactor depends on the presence of suitable catalyst(s) capable of inducing an oxidation reaction that converts a reactant into a product. The catalytic reaction is catalyzed when the reactant is brought into contact with the catalyst. The efficiency of the catalyst is then reflected in the
