It offers all the functionality of Adobe Photoshop plus some useful features like layer animation and animation, which set it apart from Photoshop's competition, Elements. The interface is a little more confusing than some other programs, adobe says, but it's a clean work space, which makes it an ideal all-purpose tool. You can even create all you want in the layer palette, and duplicate then change the new copies, which you can even animate in Photoshop thereby virtually creating your own animation without too many headaches. Other interesting tweaks and features include Smart Blur, which can blur hair and remove unwanted details to give a smooth, well-focused image, and the correction Brush tool, which makes it easy to correct mistakes in the photos you import. And the toolkit is great for retouching images and quickly creating special effects like smoke and reflections. Selective Camouflage effects are used to create that realistic look you see in some of nature's examples as the background of this grandmother. Note also that the recorded footage is totally different than the backdrops that most photographers would naturally shoot in the real world. But if you have a drone, a high-powered camera, or a regular camera, RAW is the best option to get the best from your photographs.

So why should you shoot and process using a raw processing software? Well, the reason is that RAW is the original data that is collected from the sensor. The information in the raw file that can not be found anywhere else, or raw processing software. Why do I want raw? Because the more RAW you shoot the bigger the final file will be. Since the file size is variable it will take as much space as needed. Let's dive into this further by creating the same image from scratch with only RAW files. First let's get started in Photoshop.
